- 1) Proofread all the time - make it a part of your schedule so you't get good at spotting grammar and spelling errors. Students must remember that practice does not make perfect, but instead it is only with the combination of practice and experience that you will become excellent at picking out mistakes in a document.
- 2) How to avoid making too many sentences as dependent clauses - Many students do not know how to punctuate correctly so they end up making sentences where one dependent clause flows into another without a pause or comma. You have to understand this: If you want your teacher to notice your writing skills, then correct all the problem areas on your essays as soon as possible after creating them. Otherwise, your grades are going to suffer because people judge based on what they see; therefore poor writing skills are either a lack of time for research or a lack of words to express thoughts clearly.

3) Know how to use your vocabulary - If you want your writing skills to be perceived positively, then make sure that you don't use words that are too difficult for others to understand because people will not be able to relate with it. Instead, choose words with simpler meanings so the reader won't have any problems in understanding what you're trying to explain.

4) Keep your sentence structure varied - It is very important for the sentences that you write to flow together well because if it doesn't, then it means that you lack structure in your work and this can turn off readers who are not interested in reading essays that sound like they were written by robots.

5) Keep your paragraphs varied - Readers need to feel a certain amount of comfort when they are reading because if they don't, then the reader will simply move on to something else.

6) Avoid Using clichés at all costs! - When you are writing, it is important that you pick out words and phrases that can be used as alternatives for clichés so as not to annoy or distract the reader with negative feelings from these hackneyed phrases. You have to understand that readers tend to pay more attention to things that appear in bold print - this is why it should only contain keywords which means getting rid of unnecessary repetition.

7) Be able to find an appropriate structure for different types of essays - The first thing that students must do is pick out a topic that they are good at explaining and keeping the attention of their readers "write my essay".
